Scope and content

Professor Gregory Bush (History Department) and the Institute for Public History (IPH) have recorded a series of interviews around the issue of public spaces in South Florida. Participants, who are representative of the diverse cultural milieu of the region, reflect and provide insights on migration, gentrification, the history of individual neighborhoods, housing, and community services. These voices help to articulate the ongoing discourse on public space as it applies to South Florida's History of development. The recordings and accompanying transcripts of the oral history collection document the unique experiences of the region's inhabitants. In addition, the collection serves as a repository of primary source materials for students, faculty and the general public.
